– 201 not out and an exalted place
in cricket history.

here is footage doing the rounds of social media of a young Pakistani boy replicating Glenn Maxwell's epic World Cup double century.

Waving his bat like a fly swatter, the boy takes various nonchalant poses as he sends the ball flying in all directions.

He starts in orthodox fashion, just as Maxwell did in his 201 not out against Afghanistan, then becomes funkier as his innings proceeds.

It finishes with the boy lying on the ground for an audacious one-handed reverse flick, talking on a mobile phone while swiping the ball back-handed from his presence and removing a stump to thump the ball back over the bowler.

The boy bats in a fashion that would be unimaginable and probably impossible for the majority of the cricket world.

So too Maxwell.

He is unorthodox but his remarkable innings at Wankhede Stadium was based on the most orthodox principles.

His severe cramping restricted his movement but that meant he kept his head as still as humanly possible. That is a direct lift from the MCC coaching manual.

He played the ball late, the consequence of not being able to leave his crease, and worked it into parts of the field where the fielders weren't. It was a brilliant example of the craft of batting, the combination of tactical, technical and temperamental factors used to distribute the ball to the batsman's greatest benefit. The pain and restriction forced by the cramp, the reduced benefit of running singles and the need to maintain most of the strike, even with a capable tailender in Pat Cummins at the other end, allowed Maxwell to Steve Waugh's unbeaten 120 took Australia to a famous win in the 1999 World Cup.

three ODIs that preceded the famous 5-0 "Blackwash" Test series. The master blaster was as masterful as any stage of his extraordinary career, blasting 21 fours and five sixes in the best ODI innings I have ever seen live. He was in at 2-11, saw the score slump to 7-102 before Michael Holding's arrival at 9-166 prompted one of the most blistering onslaughts in the game's history – without a single reverse sweep or lap shot in sight. Like Cummins, Holding remained 12 not out as the silent partner in a match-winning and unbeaten century stand.

②RICKY PONTING 140* v India,
Wanderers 2003. The Australian captain monstered India in the World Cup final. After a lively start, he sent a message to his team-mates to "strap themselves
in" for what was about to come.
That was acceleration that produced G-forces previously unrecorded in the game.

3 STEVE WAUGH 120* v South Africa, Headingley 1999. The innings in which Herschelle Gibbs dropped the World Cup. Supposedly. Waugh's sledge might be apocryphal but there was nothing fabricated about his ice-cool batting. In at 3-48 in the chase for 272 on a tough pitch against a high-class attack, Waugh was dropped at 56 but kept his nerve to get his team home with two balls to spare. The result was critical a few days later when Australia tied with the same team in the semifinal but went through to the final based on the Leeds win. 4 SANATH JAYASURIYA 82 v England, Faisalabad 1996. It was only the 40th highest score of the Sri Lankan's career but memorable nonetheless, not just because it was my first trip to Pakistan. In an era when opening batsmen did not attempt to plaster every delivery into the crowd, Jayasuriya's two-runs-a-ball fireworks discombobulated the England bowlers and heralded the arrival of modern batting. S MICHAEL BEVAN 74* v Probably the greatest finisher in ODI ranks, at least until run chases changed to a couple of sixes an over delivered with giant bats on small outfields. Australia were in deep trou-

a capable ally in Andy Bichel who was buoyed by his 7-20 earlier in the day. "There is always more time than you think," Bevan said after the most measured his 196 ODI innings guided

ble until Bevan found of his 196 ODI innings guided Australia to 208 with a couple of balls to spare.

And now to the TV specials.

• GLENN MAXWELL 201* v

Afghanistan, Wankhede 2023.

The best of the lot.

2 ADAM GILCHRIST 149 v Sri Lanka, Bridgetown 2007. Half-centuries in the previous two World Cup finals had set Australia on the path to victory; this knock delivered the hattrick almost single-handedly. Possessed of immense power and timing, Gilchrist also had a sense of occasion second to none. A squash ball in his glove aided his grip as 13 fours and eight sixes flowed from his bat. The game finished in the dark but Sri Lanka had been overshadowed well before then.

HERSCHELLE GIBBS 175 v Australia, Wanderers 2006. When 438 beats 434 on the last ball of the scheduled 100 overs, you know it has been some sort of match. Australia's world record score lasted about three hours before Gibbs, batting at No.3, got some sort of revenge for his Waugh flaw all those years earlier. Inspired by Jacques Kallis's quip that Australia were 15 runs short of par, Gibbs flayed the bowling to all corners of the famous Johannesburg ground.

ANDREW SYMONDS 143* v
Pakistan, Wanderers 2003. Only in the World Cup team because Shane Warne had been sent home after a positive drug test, Symonds finally realised his potential after five years of fits and starts. His bruising and balanced contribution ignited a World Cup winning streak that extended across two complete tournaments.

GCLIVE LLOYD 102 v Australia, Lord's 1975. The first World Cup final was one of the first televised matches into Australia. Memorable for Roy Fredericks standing on his wicket while hitting a first over six, Viv Richards' three direct hit run-outs, and Dennis Lillee and Jeff Thomson trying in vain to run 17 off the last ball as the crowd flooded Lord's, the West Indies captain illuminated the contest with his brutal batting in the first innings.

Martin said 2024 membership will be offered to existing members first and a registration day will be held in the new year.
